CARE WORK
DREAMING DISABILITY JUSTICE
A MODEST PROPOSAL FOR A FAIR TRADE EMOTIONAL LABOR ECONOMY

(CENTERED BY DISABLED, FEMME OF COLOR, WORKING-CLASS/POOR GENIUS)

Femme: A person who has one of a million kinds of queer femme or feminine genders. Part of a multiverse of femme-gendered people, who have histories and communities in every culture since the dawn of time. Often complicated remixes that break away from white, able-bodied, upper-middle-class, cis femininity, remixing it to harken to fat or working class or Black or brown or trans or nonbinary or disabled or sex worker or other genders of femme to grant strength, vulnerability, and power to the person embodying them.

The thing about being a working-class or poor and/or disabled and/or parenting and/or Black, Indigenous, or brown femme is that people are going to ask you to do stuff for them. Oh, are they ever.

They’re going to ask you to listen, do a favor, do an errand, drop everything to go buy them some cat food or crisis-counsel them. Manage logistics, answer feelings emails, show up, empathize, build and maintain relationships. Organize the childcare, the access support, the food. Be screamed at, de-escalate, conflict resolute. They’re going to say, “Can I just pick your brain about something?” and then send you a five-paragraph email full of pretty goddamn complex questions. It’d be real nice if you could get back to them ASAP. They’re going to ask if you can email them your powerpoint and all your resources.
Some of them will be people who are close to you; some of them will be total strangers. Do you have a minute?

For free.

Forever.

And you know what’s going to happen? You’re going to do those things. Because you do, indeed, care. Because it’s the right thing to do. Because you’re good at it. Because you want to.

And because: your life as a working-class or poor and/or sex-working and/or disabled and/or Black or brown femme person has taught you that the only damn way you or anybody survives is by helping each other. No institutions exist to help us survive—we survive because of each other. Your life is maintained by a complex, nonmonetary economy of shared, reciprocal care. You drop off some extra food; I listen to you when you’re freaking out. You share your car with me; I pick you up from the airport. We pass the same twenty dollars back and forth between each other, building movements and communities as we go. It’s maybe what hippies mean when they talk about the gift economy; it’s just a million times more working-class, femme, Black and brown, and sick in bed.

We live in a white, capitalist, colonialist, ableist patriarchy that oppresses in many ways. One of them is that femininity is universally reviled. Patriarchy, racism, transmisogyny, colonialism, ableism, classism, and whorephobia come together to dish out hate to folks who are femme or feminine in extra fun ways. In the queer communities I have been a part of since the 1990s, I have witnessed over and over how femmephobia, sexism, and transmisogyny act together to view femininity and femmeness as weak, less than, not as smart or competent, “hysterical,” “too much,” and not as worthy of praise or respect. Forget femme invisibility; the thing most femmes I know are impacted by is lack of femme respect. Femmephobia and transmisogyny infuse queer and mainstream cultures in a million ways, from the ways in which femme genders are seen as inherently less radical and more capitalist/assimilationist (assuming money spent on makeup and dresses is somehow more capitalist than money spent on bow ties and butch hair wax) to the ways in which, as writer Morgan M. Page notes, “any minor slip of language or politics and [trans women] are labeled ‘crazy trans women’ by cis people while trans men nod knowingly in agreement,” resulting in trans women being shunned and expelled from community.

Generations of femmes of many genders have written and organized about misogyny and transmisogyny in queer and trans communities, and I’m able to suck in a deep breath of air now and then because of this work.

But I remain, with many other femme and feminine people, harmed by misogyny—where endless free care work and emotional labor is simply the role my community and the world has for us. We are supposed to wipe the asses of the world without ceasing. As a newly physically disabled, working-class femme of color in the 1990s, I often felt how the queer and radical prison justice communities I was part of looked down upon my gender, especially when I was disabled and broke and surviving abuse and needing support. Then I really sucked—I was just another needy, weak girl, huh? The one place femme people could receive respect in those communities was if we were tough, invulnerable, always “on,” and never needing a thing. I know I’m not alone, and I know this experience has not ended.

The working-class and poor femmes, Black and brown femmes, sick and disabled femmes, parenting femmes and sex-working and rural femmes I know hold it the fuck down. We pull off shit—from organizing complex marches and transformative justice actions to the life-support work of making sure people are fed, don’t die, and don’t get evicted—on no sleep and low spoons and a quarter tank of gas, over and over again.
Our organizing skills in these departments are incredible, and often not valued as much as masculine or charismatic leadership, or indeed seen as skills. I want our skills and competency to be respected and rewarded. What I think is a problem is when this labor both becomes the only way femmes are rewarded in community and isn’t seen as a choice but as what you’re just supposed to do (because you’re femme, right?). This expectation can be voiced as a veiled or direct compliment—You’re so competent, right? You’re so good at this, of course we wanted to ask you—but it doesn’t make the work itself less, well, a gendered demand to work a whole lot. When you’re in this gendered situation, you’re also presumed to be endlessly available and interruptible. People ask you for help or labor, and “no” is nowhere in their conception of what your response might be. Far too often, the emotional labor we do as femmes or feminine people is not seen as labor—it’s seen as air. It’s that little thing you do on the side. Not real organizing, not real work, just talking about feelings and buying groceries. Girl stuff. Femme stuff. Disabled and sick stuff, not a real activist holding a big meeting stuff. Thanks, though! That was really helpful!

Before I go any further, I want to be really clear about a few things: I don’t think that only femme or feminine people offer care labor, or can. I know femmes who suck at this stuff. And I know many masculine and other-gendered people who do care labor, and I want all genders of people to be receiving and providing that labor in our communities. I’ve heard masculine folks talk about ways the gendered nature of care labor affects them—from being expected to always be physically super-able-bodied and strong to being expected to be “the rock” that will always be there, without having needs of their own. From Black and brown and working-class and poor men and masculine people being seen through a racist, classist lens that is surprised when they are loving and caring, parenting, and doing care work to disabled masculine people being impacted by complex ways that disability is feminized and denied disabled bodily autonomy. What I want to tease out and focus on are the ways that misogyny, femmephobia, and transmisogyny come together to royally screw over femme people of many genders; how misogyny, femmephobia, and transmisogyny are part of global systems of gender that extract a hell of a lot of labor and energy from femme and feminized people, from parenting and caretaking being considered “free labor” to sexist assumptions of femme perma-availability being made in queer and trans communities. Also, the gendered wage gap is real. Cis and trans women really do get paid less than cis men, and women and femmes who are racialized, disabled, imprisoned and institutionalized, trans, rural and poor/working class get paid extra bad.

Second, I’m not against care work existing. I love the care and mutual aid we give each other in queer, trans, sick and disabled and working class and queer and trans Black, Indigenous, and people of color (QTBIPOC) communities. As a sick and disabled, working-class, brown femme, I wouldn’t be alive without communities of care, and neither would most people I love. Some of my fiercest love is reserved for how femmes and sick and disabled queers show up for each other when every able-bodied person “forgets” about us. Sick and disabled folks will get up from where we’ve been projectile vomiting for the past eight hours to drive a spare Effexor to their friend’s house who just ran out. We do this because we love each other, and because we often have a sacred trust not to forget about each other. Able-bodied people who think we are “weak” have no idea; every day of our disabled lives is like an Ironman triathlon. Disabled, sick, poor, working-class, sex-working and Black and brown femmes are some of the toughest and most resilient folks I know. You have to develop complex strengths to survive this world as us.

I love how working-class, femme, and disabled this care labor is. I just want it to also not be seen as an automatic expectation of any femme at any time! I want some rules so we don’t feel drained, exhausted, and fucked over. I want it to be a choice. And I want its next-level genius of skill to be recognized. This is skilled labor!

So I would like to advance the radical notion that providing care is work. By work, I mean it’s just that: work. I mean that the care work we give is essential to building movements that are accessible and sustainable. We are building and maintaining movements when we’re texting to make sure someone is okay, talk on the phone for hours, talk shit on the couch, drop off a little care. Those things are not a sideline or an afterthought to our movements. They are our movements. And I have seen some of the most femme movements and communities—disabled ones, sex-working ones—organize very differently because they are fully centered around feminized, sick survivor care labor.

I tried an experiment recently. For one week, I logged how many times I was asked for care labor or support, and what I noticed about who was doing the asking, and how. My findings? Every single—really—femme person who hit me up started their requests by asking me how I was doing and prefaced their requests by saying things like, “Hey, if you have time,” “Do you have the capacity to give some support?” or “When and if you have time ...” They also were more likely to offer to buy me lunch, trade me for something, run an errand, or pay me. And they were more graceful and heard it the first time when I said, “Hey, I’m so sorry, but I can’t right now.”

Masculine and non-femme friends, however, were much more likely to just hit me up and say, “Hey, could you ...”: pray for them, hook them up with a publisher, tell them what doctor they should go to, listen to them vent about an intense transformative justice process gone wrong, be a reference, or answer a question. It was not uncommon for these requests to come from someone I had not heard from for months. There was no, “Do you think you have the time or spoons to do this?” no suggestion of “I could offer X thing in return,” and no “If you don’t, it’s totally okay.” There was also no, “How are you doing?”

This pissed me off. I also knew I was far from alone. My conversations with other femme people are full of us describing our care labor—and of us bitching about how exploited, unappreciated, and exhausted we often feel when that labor isn’t recognized. The sexism and femme oppression in these dynamics loom huge. Disabled, white, working-class femme poet Tara Hardy recently remarked at ADEPT, a sick and disabled queer performance at Gay City, Seattle’s queer theater, “Femmes get objectified two ways, one sexually, the other as Mommy.” In the sexist world, Mommy does a million hours of unpaid labor a week without anyone asking them.

There’s been a huge amount of writing about emotional labor in the past few years—everything from the oft-reposted Metafilter thread on gendered emotional labor that is now fifty single-spaced pages long to essays by queer and trans writers of color like Kai Cheng Thom and Caleb Luna to Ada Hoffman’s wonderful essay about autistic practices of emotional labor to a million conversations I’ve seen and taken part in with friends and comrades. In thinking about the roots and histories of unpaid and unrecognized labor by feminine people, I don’t know how to capture their enormity. But I think about movements like Black Women for Wages for Housework and others who fought for the audacious demand that people should get paid wages for the labor of homemaking and parenting the WSCCAP conceives of as “naturally” being unpaid. I think about movements like the National Domestic Workers Alliance’s Caring Across Generations campaign, where elders, disabled people, and the personal care workers who support them—many of whom are immigrant, Black, or brown people performing the feminized labor of personal care support work—are organizing together for fair wages and work conditions and for state health and social services departments to raise pay rates allowed for care support workers. I think about how little people working in "pink-collar" fields that are highly feminized like cleaning, caretaking, childcare, waitressing, and service work get paid. I think about my mom, a former waitress, explaining to me when I was seven years old how waitresses are legally paid far under the minimum wage and are dependent on tips to make any kind of money (tips that depend on the femme emotional labor of being seen as sexy, nice, and cute), and how you should either be ready to pay twenty-five percent minimum as a tip or you shouldn't go out to eat. (The current minimum waitress wage in Massachusetts is $2.66 an hour. She made a hell of a lot less in the 1960s.) And I think about Black, Indigenous, brown, working-class women’s and femme bodies being forced to work for free or for pennies—as enslaved people on plantations, in Export Processing Zone factories in Sri Lanka and many other Global South countries, and beyond. I think about disabled and Mad people locked in nursing homes and institutions working for well under minimum wage in “sheltered workshops,” and I think about people in prison working for pennies an hour. Finally, I think about the rage and oppression many sex workers face for having the gall to actually charge for sexual, emotional labor! It's impossible to think and talk about emotional labor, care work, and gender without talking and thinking about all these intertwined histories and realities of oppression and resistance.

All of this has started me thinking about what the solutions might be. If care labor is, well, labor, and we participate in an emotional economy all the time, what would a just care labor economy look and feel like? What would I want to get paid (in money or care labor or appreciation), and how? What would I want the conditions of my labor to be, to feel that my work was in safe, compensated conditions that had my worker's rights at the center?
